You will need a lively person to be the Host and a scorekeeper. Pick four to six couples and divide them into two teams of two to three couples. Each team would be like a family on Family Feud. The remaining couples at your event are the audience.

Use four questions for the team to team competition and reserve five questions for the Fast Money round at the end.

The teams should be lined up on opposite sides of the room. A single member from each team comes forward to answer one of the four questions. Members must hit the buzzer (dollar store light or buzzer can be used or just slap a table) first to answer the question. If they hit the buzzer at the same time, they both get to give an answer and the one with the most popular answer is the winner.

The member who answers correctly first (or gives the more popular response) has the option to pass or play. This means that the member can elect to have his/her team attempt to guess the remaining answers or they may pass the play to the other team to guess the remaining answers.

Each team is given three wrong answers on every question, and once they have given three wrong answers, then the alternate team is allowed to provide a single correct answer to the question and may steal all the points (including the answer they gave). If the alternate team doesn't provide a correct answer, then the first team gets the accumulated points.

The team with the most points after 4 questions goes on to play Fast Money and chooses two members to play the round. One team member leaves the room while the other is given 20 seconds to answer five questions. If he or she cannot think up an answer to a question, he or she may pass. A team member may revisit a passed question at the end, time permitting.

The number of people giving each answer is revealed once all five answers are given or time has expired (whichever comes first). The player earns one point for each person that gave the same answer; at least two people must have given that answer for it to score. When revealing the number of people giving the same response, the host says the familiar phrase, "Survey said!..."

Once all the points for the first player are tallied, the second team member comes back and is given 25 seconds to answer the same five questions. The host will ask for another response should a duplicate answer be made. If the team accumulates 200 points or more, they win Fast Money!
